Detroit files for bankruptcy

Detroit used to be home of the once-thriving American automobile industry. Known as Motor City, USA, the city has now applied for bankruptcy. For decades it has been struggling with spiralling debts, which now total US$18.5 billion (14 billion Euros).

While General Motors still has its headquarters there the city today is in a sorry state. Urban decline is everywhere. Some 70,000 properties lie abandoned. People have moved out to the suburbs or beyond due to no work in Detroit. The once great city is now regarded as an economic basket case. Its public services are near collapse.

With no money from property taxes the city's decline is indeed stark. There is no money for ambulances and 40% of the street lights are burnt out. The city is being forced to sell off what it can to pay off its creditors. The mess will take years to sort out. The only winners are the American lawyers filing lawsuits against the city.

Republican Governor Rick Snyder on Friday said the city had filed for bankruptcy because it was "basically broke". Governor Snyder said, "There has been a long period of decline. It's time to do something about it. We're the comeback State in Michigan, but to be a great State, we need Detroit on the path to being a great city again." He added, "Now is the opportunity to stop 60 years of decline. We will come out with a stronger, better Detroit and a format to grow this city. The citizens of not just this city but the State deserve it."

What are at stake are the future pensions and retiree health benefits of city workers who now appear to be in battle with the Governor. Unions have accused the governor of using bankruptcy to try to seize power. This story is ongoing...
