

Death of the British High Street

If you are considering a visit to Britain you might like to do some shopping. Where better to do this than in a small quaint market town. Visitors however, might be surprised by what they see...

Gone are the days of seeing a typical British High Street bustling with shoppers. Today people visit out-of-town shopping centres and supermarkets. The result has caused the gradual death of the typical British High Street.

People's shopping habits have changed. They no longer shop in butchers, bakers or greengrocers. Today everyone shops in supermarkets, as it's far quicker and easier, with everything in one place.

Other reasons why so many shops have closed in High Streets are the high council tax charges, high rents demanded by unscrupulous landlords and the rapid rise of online shopping. The result has seen thousands of small traditional shops and pubs close, taken over by the likes of Starbucks and McDonald's.

These days nearly 60p of every £1 is spent in supermarkets rather than in the High Street. The result is High Streets are now full of betting shops, takeaway fast food outlets, charity shops, Eastern European stores and some convenience stores run by the 'Big Four' supermarkets.

Today, one in three shops in the High Street lays empty. Some urban centres have become 'ghost towns' because of the lack of shoppers. This deters potential shoppers and costs local jobs. It is also an unwelcome site for any visitor.

High Street giants to have closed and disappeared from the High Street in Britain recently include; HMV (Music), Blockbuster (Videos & DVDs) JJB Sports (Sportswear) and Woolworth (Various).
