Russian plane brought down by a bomb in Egypt

The Russian plane crash in Egypt was brought down by a bomb. According to French aviation officials it was not due to technical failures. They added the flight data recorder – the black box – suggests a “violent, sudden” explosion caused the crash, killing all 224 people on board.

According to British spies, intercepted militant calls indicated a bomb was put in the hold before take-off. Militants, known as the Sinai Province, and who are linked to the Islamic State group (IS) in Syria, have said they downed the plane.

The Metrojet Airbus A321 was flying from Sharm el-Sheikh to St. Petersburg when it came down last Saturday. Most of the victims were Russian.

US officials said on Friday that communications had been intercepted between IS officials in Syria and people in Sinai about how the jet had been brought down.

Following this new information Russian President Vladimir Putin halted all flights to the Red Sea, as well as to Cairo. Other countries, including the UK, have already suspended flights to Sharm el-Sheikh, where unsurprisingly security has now been beefed up.

British tourists have been describing the lack of security at the Egyptian airport, where for £20 they could jump the security scanner queues.

There have been chaotic scenes at Sharm el-Sheikh airport on Friday as many rescue flights agreed by airlines were forced to divert en route to the airport. EasyJet claimed that Egyptian authorities were blocking their extra flights.

The Egyptian tourist industry is expected to go into meltdown following all this. Tourism is a critical source of Egypt’s income.
