

Sunday trading laws in England and Wales set to be relaxed

Today, let's talk about Sunday trading in the UK. Currently smaller shops are allowed to open all day on a Sunday. Shops over 280m<sup>2</sup> are allowed to open for up to six hours.

British Chancellor of the Exchequer, George Osborne, is set to unveil plans to allow shops in England and Wales to open for longer on Sundays. The proposal comes after larger shops were allowed to open for longer during the Olympic and Paralympic Games in London in 2012.

Mr Osborne thinks the law should be made at local level as to whether shops should be allowed to open for longer. Currently larger shops may open for up to six hours between 10am and 6pm on a Sunday. He said there was "a growing appetite" for shopping on Sundays.

If such a move occurred it could generate more than £200m a year in additional sales alone in London. It would also create 3,000 new jobs in the capital. Spread that out across the country and that's a lot of jobs and money that could be earned. It could also counter the online threat that shops are facing today. Online retailers now account for 11% of UK retail sales overall.

Immediate criticism has come from The Association of Small Convenience Stores who said the move would force small shops to close. The Church of England is dead against changing Sunday trading laws, as it would hit already diminishing church attendances.

Sunday shopping in Europe varies. For example in Austria, the shops remain closed, while in Slovakia, the shopping malls open from 10am to 9pm seven days a week. On Sunday afternoons and evenings the malls are mostly packed.
